Race, Ethnicity, and Place in a Changing America By John W. Frazier, Eugene L. Tettey-Fio

Twenty-first century America provides an opportunity to explore geographic reminders of America's race problems, and the cultural and ethnic patterns, that geographers have studied for centuries. There is an educational imperative to provide today's students with examples and explanations of American human geography, which has never been more relevant than today. To illustrate the breadth of these ethnic and racial issues, we invited selected participants of the landmark 2004 223Race, Ethnicity, and Place Conference224 at Howard University to rewrite their research findings for an undergraduate audience. Thirty-seven authors, mostly geographers but other social scientists, participated with us in the production of this volume. Section one of this text provides a foundation using several concepts and perspectives of race and ethnicity as they relate to geographic space, place, and landscapes, ranging from a victim viewpoint (Malcolm X) to educational policy perspective, and from the changing importance of place as an immigrant gateway to the personal perspective of a first-generation U.S. immigrant. The remainder of the text contains four sections that blend historical geographic patterns of minorities and contemporary and emerging racial and ethnic patterns across the nation. Each section deals with diverse ethnic groups that have been racially classified as a single group. Exploring these individually brings a greater understanding of similarities and differences among diverse cultures. Finally, the last section provides a number of examples of increasing ethnic diversity among American minority populations, expression of culture and ethnicity, and the issues they create.

Editorial Review

Review

"This timely volume is a storehouse of knowledge that brings together a wide selection of scholars in a rigorous and comprehensive assessment of race, ethnicity, and place. The primacy of place in ethnic and racial discourse is resurrected in this volume." ---- Professor Joseph Oppong, University of North Texas

"Race, Ethnicity, and Place in a Changing America provides one of the most rigorous and comprehensive assessments available on racial and ethnic geographies and explains why they are important to all of us." ---- from the Foreword by Orlando Taylor, Howard University, and Douglas Richardson, Association of American Geographers
