The object of this book, for Barthes is not to hover over the propositions of content ordinary credited to these three men -- ie, a philosophy of evil ,a utopian socialism, a mystique of obedience--but rather to consider Sade, Fourier , and Loyola as formulators, inventors of writing, wielders of a text: operator, as Barthes calls them. Whereby Barthes pursues a project, suggested in all his other books, whose theoretical intention can be discernment in far can one go with a text by speaking only of its writing? How is what it signifies suspended (historically, psychologically aesthetically ) in order to released what it reveals materially?
