Editorial Review

From Library Journal

While love is often perceived and experienced as perplexing, journalist Troupp argues that there are specific psychological factors related to our personality and past experiences that draw us to our partners. Through the use of information gathered from interviews with 16 diverse couples, combined with psychoanalytic theory, Troupp examines the four stages of love-hope, projection, disillusionment, and attachment-and the four types of attraction-complementarity, similarity, shared defense, and repetition of past patterns. Through the stories of the interviewees, Troupp covers important issues faced in relationships: the decision to commit, expectations of the future together, dependence vs. independence, and sexual passion, as well as how the original choice of the couple manages to stay alive and how conflict influences the relationship. This well-written, serious look at mate selection based on psychological factors would strongly complement other books on the subject, such as Helen E. Fisher's The Anatomy of Love (Norton, 1992) and Mary Batten's Sexual Strategies (Tarcher, 1992). Highly recommended for all collections.
