Editorial Review

Review

"A unique book that promises to be useful for both artists and arts organizations alike." -- Mara Walker, Chief Planning Officer, Americans for the Arts

"Filled with fresh insight, this wide-ranging volume opens up a long-overdue dialogue about ethical issues." -- Marjorie Schwarzer, Professor, Museum Studies, John F. Kennedy University

"This admirably smart anthology reliably raises the right questions and will contribute decisively to that task." -- David Carrier, Professor, Case Western Reserve University/Cleveland Institute of Art

From the Publisher

Over the last thirty years, works of art have gained increased investment value and commodity status. This significant shift affects both policy and practice in museums, artists' studios, conservation laboratories, commercial galleries, and auction houses, as well as among critics and historians. Ethical lapses in the visual arts usually receive little attention, until breaches force issues into the public eye, such as reports of museums dealing with for-profit exhibition organizers and vain collectors who demand control, the looting of antiques from abroad, and the de-accessioning of civic treasures, to name just a few.

From the Author

"The need for a new text on ethics and the visual arts from the perspective of American culture is painfully evident," the editors observe. "This volume does not provide readers with conclusive answers about ethics in the visual arts, but it raises questions that we all need to ask and think about."
