I marveled at the amount of wisdom, compassion, and practical ideas packed into its pages. The wisdom begins with her gentle reminder that we have to start with ourselves

if we want to make meaningful changes in our children's relationships with each other. The compassion is in Dr. Laura's empathy for everyone in the mix—including angry and worried parents. And the ideas aren't just practical and usable—many of them are downright fun. You'll laugh out loud just reading them, and everyone will laugh when you try them out. Wouldn't that be a nice change from bickering and clobbering?"

It is a wonderful resource that gives parents the tools to not only help our children while in the midst of conflict, but also helps us to teach our children how to be the loving, kind and respectful brothers and sisters we know they can be."

— Gina Osher, The Twin Coach

"If you are the parent of more than one child, this is the book for you. Laura Markham begins at the beginning – the how and when to tell your child that they are about to become a big brother or sister -- and then offers concrete suggestions to help you lay down the foundation for a healthy sibling relationship throughout your children's lives. I know that I will highly recommend this book to all my clients."

--Rev. Susan Nason parent educator

"Dr. Laura's examples and coaching-based methodology make parenting siblings far less daunting....Her book reassures us that doing our best with the right tools, including self-regulation, connection, and coaching, can build a much happier and more peaceful family."

--Nancy Peplinsky, Founder & Executive Director of Holistic Moms Network

"In the peaceful parenting household, there are no time-outs. Stickers, toys, and candy are not rewards for good behavior. And when it comes to siblings, children aren't taught to share, but to take turns. With this book, Markham (Peaceful Parent, Happy Kids) aims to help readers effect a subtle but powerful paradigm shift and raise children who are self-regulated and driven by empathy rather than a reward/punishment dynamic. Model conversations are idealized but artfully crafted—"I guess it hurt your feelings when your sister wouldn't let you play with her and her friend... you still can't stand outside her door and scream like that, sweetie"—and provide an entire vocabulary for the book's philosophy. The book's third part is directed specifically toward parents anticipating baby number two, but other chapters offer more than enough solutions for parents already up to their elbows in sibling rivalries and fights. The book draws on scientific studies as much as possible, but the available research findings are often inconclusive. Markham makes her case most through common sense, putting the responsibility on parents to exemplify peaceful, positive behavior that uplifts the entire family."

It drives parents crazy. You do your best to be fair, but your children insist on competing over everything! Why?

- A sense of fairness is innate. Research shows that even babies have some concept of parity. It seems to be one of the human mind’s built-in survival mechanisms to help us live in groups.
- They desperately want to know that you love them more than anyone else, so their survival is ensured. This is genetically programmed. Their genes want to know whom you would save if a tiger came marauding. If you love their sibling more, they’re toast.
- Children aren’t so different from adults. The entire legal profession is based on the human desire to be treated fairly. The problem isn’t that your children want fairness. It’s that they think you’re supposed to be Solomon and dole it out, but there’s no way both children will feel fairly treated by any solution any parent can devise. That’s not just because we’re fallible humans, but because children in search of fairness are motivated by fear, which is always irrational. Back to the previous point: They need proof the sibling isn’t being favored, to ensure their survival.

So how can you deal with the whole concept of fairness without going crazy, and in a way that helps your children feel more secure and less competitive?

1. Empathize. Your child has big feelings about this issue. After all, at an unconscious level this is about her survival. Trying to argue your child out of her feelings won’t work. Acknowledging them will help her feel understood, which means she can stop fighting. This is the most important thing you can do to help your child with her feeling that things aren’t fair.

Instead of arguing: “Of course you get to go first sometimes, don’t exaggerate!”

Empathize: “It feels like you never get to go first, huh?”

Instead of explaining: “He’s older, so he gets to stay up later.”

Empathize: “You wish you could stay up later . . . It’s hard to stop playing and get ready for bed . . . I bet when you’re eight like your brother, you’ll love staying up later.”

Notice you aren’t agreeing. You might even be pretty sure that she went first last night. You’re showing her you understand how she feels, nothing more, and nothing less. If you think back to times when you’ve felt understood, you will understand just how great a gift this is.

2. Focus on what each child wants rather than getting hooked when they compare or compete. When your children accuse you of favoring their sibling, you know intuitively that this is a serious accusation. On some level, they're saying you don't have enough love and protection for them, since you're using it up on their sister. Understandably, you can get hooked and argue about who got what. But that's a battle you'll never win. Next time:

Instead of arguing: "I did not give him more—see, you have the same amount!"

Acknowledge the need your child is expressing without reference to his sibling, and reassure him that there's always more than enough for everyone: "It sounds like you're ready for more noodles. Show me how much you want and I'll dish them out for you."

What if there aren't any more noodles, or you aren't about to give them seconds on dessert? In other words, your child thinks she's been treated unfairly, and you can't (or won't) make it better by giving her what she thinks she deserves to make things fair? Address the perceived unfairness symbolically, by showering your child with love. That's what she's actually worried about, even if she doesn't know it. So you might say something like: "Oh, no! His piece was bigger? I can't believe it—this is terrible! Here I sat, making sure the two pieces were exactly the same, and you're telling me my splitting skills are slipping? You know what that means. If your piece was even hundredth smaller, that means I need to make it up to you—with a hundred hugs and kisses!" You grab her and fill her up with love. You aren't teasing her, or belittling her need. You're actually meeting her real need—to be as important to you as her brother. You're letting her know that there's always more than enough love for her, no matter what her brother gets. And the laughter helps her work through any fears that were triggered by thinking that you secretly prefer her brother.

3. Give material possessions based on need; be sure love is limitless. If one child has outgrown her sneakers and the other hasn't, explain to all the kids that today it's Asia's turn for new sneakers, and Amira will get hers when she outgrows her current pair. Be alert to help Amira past her envy when Asia struts in: "It can be hard to watch your sister get something new when you didn't . . . Don't worry, when you need shoes, you'll get them, too. You know that no matter what your sister gets, there's always enough for you." Then give her a huge hug. What she really needs is reassurance that you love her as much as her sister.

4. Don't be afraid to treat children differently. Interestingly, several studies in which children were interviewed about how parents treat them and their siblings have found that kids don't mind being treated differently, if they think the outcome is fair.¹ They may give you a hard time because their brother stays up later, but they do understand that an older child gets more privileges and more responsibilities. In fact, you might want to talk about this with each child before his birthday. What new responsibility does he think he's ready for?

5. Fill each child's cup. The reason children compete is to ensure their survival in the face of danger and scarce resources. So your job as the parent is to love each child so he never needs to wonder if you might love his sibling more. That would be impossible, since he knows your love for him is limitless. In practice, that means:

- You seek him out for hugs and smiles, to look at the fireflies together out the window at dusk, and just to tell him you're so glad you're his mother.
- When he needs you, you show up. If your hands are full, you apologize and tell him when you'll be able to tend to him; then keep your promise.

- You surprise him with little notes, favors, and activities. This takes some mental energy, which as a parent can be in short supply. One solution is to keep little notes on your to-do list, so that every week you do one small special thing for each child.
- You make time for Special Time and the other preventive maintenance practices. Sometimes you take each child, one at a time, for a special adventure on a Saturday afternoon. If they fight about who goes on the first Saturday, while the other kids have to wait until subsequent weeks, you can “sweeten the deal” for the ones who have to wait by giving them longer adventures.
